

Asia-Europe Training Course
“Environmental Human Rights:
A Present and Future Challenge for Youth Work”
9 – 15 November 2010
Paju, Republic of Korea

FACT SHEET

BACKGROUND

Asia-Europe Training Courses are important intercultural learning instruments of non-formal education that focus on the personal and professional development of young people and on the capacity building of youth organisations in Asia and Europe. These activities aim at bringing together the next generation of leaders, equipping them with knowledge, skills and attitudes that enables them to make meaningful contacts, address negotiations, have significant exchanges and deal in a fruitful and open way with any type of interregional issues within their efforts to deepen the Asia-Europe co-operation one step further.

The Directorate of Youth and Sport of the Council of Europe and the Asia-Europe Foundation (ASEF) have in common a commitment to intercultural dialogue through youth work and youth cooperation. A first cooperation activity was held at the European Youth Centre Budapest in 2009: a training course on intercultural dialogue and human rights education. After the success of that training course both partners decided to continue their cooperation and provide their respective youth partners with further opportunities to learn and work together, to exchange experience and ideas and to develop common projects and cooperation.

ASEF and the Council of Europe's youth sector will focus their cooperation in 2010 on an issue that is important and relevant for the Asia-Europe context and for the globalised world: environmental rights, which are the “next generation” of human rights. Given the interconnected world that we live in today, the advancement of technology, medicine, and philosophy, as well as the environmental challenges brought by climate change and global warming, existing human rights are affected and sometimes new ones are being claimed. Among the currently debated rights, environmental rights are understood to revolve largely around the idea of a right to a liveable environment both for the present and the future generations.

These claims are being challenged by the consequences of economic and financial crises in many European countries and by the failure of the global drive for countering climate change, which recently came forward again at the Climate Summit in Copenhagen in 2009. Cooperation between citizens and non-governmental are in this situation even more important, especially in understanding the common challenges and needs, in learning about the mutual realities and concerns and in building a common concern for environmental protection rooted on equality of human dignity and of human needs.

Despite the geographical continuum between the Asian and the European continents, the contacts and cooperation between civil societies, especially youth organisations and movements, remain sporadic and loose. By organising this training course and continuing their cooperation, the youth sector of the Council of Europe and the Asia-Europe Foundation re-affirm their commitment to support global youth cooperation and solidarity and to stimulate the intercultural dialogue that takes into account the concerns of young people.

AIMS AND OBJECTIVES

Through the training course, young people from Asia and Europe will have the opportunity to explore issues related to environmental rights and the contribution that non-formal education and youth work can bring to this area.

This Asia-Europe training aims to explore the role and contribution of youth work and non-formal education in developing environmental human rights education in Asia and Europe. The training will:

- Develop participants' understanding and competence in the areas of non-formal education, youth work and environmental human rights in the way they are understood in Asia and Europe;
- Discuss understanding of human rights, environmental human rights and the role of youth work and non-formal education in promoting them;
- Share youth work practices and responses, based on human rights education, in the participants' countries and organisations;
- Explore and prepare for follow-up initiatives and projects among participants in the field of environmental human rights and human rights education.

PROGRAMME AND WORKING METHODS

The programme of the training course will combine sessions focused on improving participants' knowledge, skills and attitudes with experience and expertise sharing. The training course will be structured as a five day programme, will gather up to 26 youth workers from Asia and Europe and will combine plenary sessions, working groups, debates and study sessions.

The use of non-formal learning methodologies, particularly those aiming at human rights education, will give the training an interactive approach, encouraging the active participation of experts, participants, trainers and facilitators and leading to follow-up projects among the participants.

The following areas and concepts will be explored during the training-course:

Environment and Human Rights

- What are the connections between the two fields?
- What is already done in these fields at this moment?
- What could be an added-value contribution of human rights education?

Non-Formal Education

- What is the contribution of non-formal education to the development of environmental (rights) education?
- What are the tools that can be used for developing environmental rights further?
- How can youth work contribute to the development of policies in the field of environmental rights?
- What are the concrete actions that youth organisations can take in order to create an impact on environmental human rights?

Public and Private Sector

- What is the role played by the public and private sectors in environmental education?
- How could the 2 sectors contribute more?
- What policies are already in place and what policies would be needed in the field of environmental rights?

The programme will be prepared and implemented by a team of experienced trainers from Asia and from Europe.

An online e-learning dimension may be added to the course in its preparatory phase and in the evaluation and follow-up.
