

Brunei's Rainforest Second To None

APR. 18: Sultanate stands to benefit enormously from conscious preservation of its environment, says British High Commissioner

Bandar Seri Begawan - Brunei Darussalam can produce a knowledge economy built around research in the fields of the environment and alternative energy.

The Sultanate can also be a significant multiplier for both international and regional best practices in conservation.

This observation was made by British High Commissioner Rob Fenn during the launching of the ASEF Green Actions' initiative in Brunei Darussalam at Universiti Brunei Darussalam yesterday.

According to him, Brunei is standing at a pinnacle point in world history.

He said: "We are confronting a terrible crisis in climate change.

"I think this part of the world is more vulnerable as compared to many other parts of the world because there are more productive economy and population centres located at the coast and we are struggling to confine the rise of world temperature to two degrees.
